I would start by clearly communicating our company's mission and long-term goals in a way that connects to their day-to-day work. During our next team meeting, I'll walk through how each project we're working on contributes to that larger vision. I'd also begin holding monthly "Vision Alignment" check-ins, where we pause to assess: "Are we just doing tasks—or are we advancing strategy?" Finally, I'd invite them to co-create team goals that ladder up to strategic outcomes, not just output.

reflection

It's been about two weeks since I truly paused to think long-term. I realized I was constantly reacting to the urgent and neglecting the important. During that reflection, I noticed that some projects I'd greenlit had little strategic value. It reminded me that I need to slow down to think—not just act.

Nina could start by asking: "What does success look like 6 months from now?" "What are the 3 most important outcomes we need to deliver?" "What am I doing that someone else could do 80% as well?" I would coach her to prioritize clarity over activity. She needs to step back weekly to evaluate direction, delegate effectively, and trust her team more. Without that shift, she'll continue being busy but not impactful.

ask_eric

How do I train my team to think more strategically instead of just completing tasks?

commitment

I will shift from reacting to planning—by scheduling intentional reflection time and pausing to assess long-term value before saying yes.

accountability

If I can identify one project I chose not to do because it lacked strategic impact—and I use that time on something that moves the team forward.

Eric's Coaching Feedback

Your worksheet responses demonstrate a strong commitment to enhancing strategic thinking both for yourself and your team. Here are some insights and recommendations to further bolster your strategic approach:

- Strengths to Reinforce:*
- Vision Communication: You're already taking significant steps to connect your team's daily tasks to the larger company vision. By initiating "Vision Alignment" check-ins and co-creating team goals, you're laying a firm foundation for strategic engagement.
- Reflection Practices: Recognizing the need to pause and reflect on long-term strategies is a critical insight. Your commitment to scheduling intentional reflection time shows a proactive approach to strategic thinking.
- Prioritizing High-Impact Initiatives: Your decision to pause the internal training program to focus on more immediate strategic needs demonstrates a clear understanding of opportunity cost and strategic alignment.
- Growth Opportunities:*
- Delegation and Trust: Echoing your advice to Nina, consider how you can delegate more effectively to free up time for strategic oversight. This will enhance your team's development and empower them to take ownership of strategic goals.
- Strategic Training for the Team: Your question about training your team to think strategically is pivotal. Developing a structured program to enhance their strategic awareness will drive long-term success and reduce task-driven reactivity.
- Recommendations:*
- Implement Strategic Thinking Workshops: Host regular workshops focused on strategic thinking skills. Use real case studies and scenarios to practice decision-making that aligns with long-term goals.
- Develop a Strategic Framework: Create and share a simple strategic decision-making framework with your team. This could include filters for saying yes or no to initiatives, focusing on strategic impact, alignment with the vision, and resource availability.

- Introduce a Strategic Dashboard: Your idea of visualizing strategic priorities is excellent. A dashboard can serve as a constant visual reminder of strategic objectives and progress, helping the team focus on what truly matters.

Your leadership journey is on a promising path. By continuing to cultivate a strategic mindset and fostering the same in your team, you'll not only achieve your goals but also inspire a culture of visionary thinking. Keep leveraging these insights, and you'll see a transformative impact on your team's strategic alignment and execution.
