I'd start by calling a quick follow-up meeting to reframe the initiative in simpler terms, focusing on the "why" behind it. I'd check for understanding and invite questions. I likely made the mistake of rushing through the announcement and assuming everyone shared the same context I had. I also may have used too much strategic jargon instead of relatable language.

reflection

Last week, I gave feedback to a team member during a tense moment. I was rushed, and my tone came off as overly critical. I'd go back and take a breath first, ask for their perspective, and frame my points more constructively.

Elena could use bullet-point outlines before meetings to stay on track. She should aim to speak in 1–2 minute bursts, then pause for questions. Using headlines first (e.g., “The key update is...”) and summarizing at the end would help. Finally, checking in with “Does that make sense?” or “Any questions before I move on?” would re-engage her team.

- Strengths to Reinforce:*
- Proactive Adjustment: Your decision to simplify the messaging around initiatives and check for understanding is commendable. This aligns well with the Crystal Clear Leadership principle of clarity.
- Reflective Practice: Your reflection on the feedback situation shows a keen ability to introspect and identify where adjustments are needed, which is critical for developing communication mastery.
- Growth Opportunities:*

- Reading the Room: Enhancing your ability to pick up on non-verbal signals can greatly improve your effectiveness in tough conversations. This will help you better gauge reactions and adapt in real-time.
- Message Adaptation: With a self-rated score of 5, focusing on adapting your communication style to different audiences and contexts will enhance your influence and ensure your message resonates with diverse stakeholders.
- Actionable Recommendations:*
- Enhance Non-verbal Awareness: To improve your ability to read the room, practice observing body language and facial expressions in meetings. Pay attention to cues like eye contact, posture, and gestures. You might also consider asking Maria to provide feedback on your non-verbal communication during meetings.
- Structured Communication: Use frameworks like bullet-point outlines or the "headline-first" approach more consistently. This will not only help you remain concise but also ensure that your key messages are clear and memorable.
- Active Listening Techniques: Continue to build on your active listening skills by summarizing what you've heard before responding. This demonstrates understanding and can diffuse tension in tough conversations.

Your commitment to slowing down and actively listening is a powerful step. It encourages a culture of openness and can significantly improve team dynamics. With Maria's support, you'll have a strong accountability partner to help ensure your growth trajectory remains positive. Keep up this momentum, and you'll see a marked improvement in your communication effectiveness.
